Hunter Mark Smith of Madison Wisconsin has proposed that free roaming cats become an “unprotected species”. This means that it will become completely legal to kill cats that have wondered into your yard.

Hunters will vote on the issue on April 11th during hearings of the Wisconsin Conservative Congress. If it passes at the WCC, it doesn’t mean it will become law but will be an advisory recommendation to state lawmakers. To become legal, the state’s animal abuse laws will have to amended.

Smith and other hunters see this as a way to keep cats from killing wild birds.

Marty DiBergi: Do you feel that playing rock 'n' roll music keeps you a child? That is, keeps you in a state of arrested development?

Derek Smalls: No. No. No. I feel it's like, it's more like going, going to a, a national park or something. And there's, you know, they preserve the moose. And that's, that's my childhood up there on stage. That moose, you know.

Marty DiBergi: So when you're playing you feel like a preserved moose on stage?

Derek Smalls: Yeah.

Samir: No one in this country can ever pronounce my name right. It’s not that hard: Samir Na-gheen-an-a-jar. Nagheenanajar.

Michael Bolton: Yeah, well at least your name isn’t Michael Bolton.

Samir: You know there’s nothing wrong with that name.

Michael Bolton: There was nothing wrong with it... until that no-talent ass clown became famous and started winning Grammys.

Samir: Hmm... well why don’t you just go by Mike instead of Michael?

Michael Bolton: No way. Why should I change? He’s the one who sucks.
